

Burton A. Fuller

Burton Fuller joined The Johns Hopkins Health System as the Vice President and Chief Supply Chain Officer in 2019. He leads the supply chain activities for a $6.2B enterprise that spans six hospitals; six surgery centers across Maryland, D.C., and Florida; and a 165,000 sq. ft consolidated service center.

Burton came to The Johns Hopkins Health System from Deloitte Consulting, where he benefited from significant experience transforming the supply chain departments of large, well-regarded academic medical centers, regional and multi-state health systems, and community hospitals. These transformations provided deep expertise in large scale expense reduction measures, post-merger integrations, and process and operational improvements. He also led engagements supporting the business and market strategies of life science and medical device manufacturers, enabling a unique perspective when navigating Manufacturer and Group Purchasing Organization (GPO) relationships. Through this work Burton championed Supply Chain's role in achieving the strategic vision of the executive teams he served.

Burton earned his degree at The College of William and Mary where he studied Finance and Biology before starting his career at Navigant Consulting. In his role at The Johns Hopkins Health System he is leading a series of changes that restructure, rebuild, and realign the Supply Chain. Clinical integration is at the core of this change, promoting a vision for supply chain that supports and advances the institution's mission to deliver outstanding care.

October 2019